

INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

In developed countries there is association between the hospital and community where the improvement of socio-economic and environmental conditions have greatly reduced the hospital admission from infectious diseases in these countries, (Benenson, 1975).

This present work was designed to study the relation between the hospital and its catchment area by analysis the characteristic features of the population of this area, the type of infectious diseases and effect of these factors on bed utilization.